A utility company has hired you to redesign their website. The HR wonk who you're dealing with has a bunch of info for you to arrange; he gives you a list of information according to the division that maintains it:

HR itself maintains the following information:

- Available jobs
- Job applications (online form)
- Job applications troubleshooting
- Benefits
- Diversity
- Contact info
  - Accounts
  - Storm division
  - Infrastructure
  - Investment
- Corporate structure
- Corporate information
- Media info (press releases)

The storm readiness division gives you the following content:

- Current power outage map (dynamically updated: the server sends out some JSON with city blocks mapped to estimated time/date to restore power, which can then be drawn on a map on the page)
- Storm outage notification numbers (numbers to call if your power goes out in a storm)
- Storm preparation
- Outage tips
- Storm response plan
- Tree trimming guide

The accounts management division gives you the following content:

- Residential account details (requires login)
- Business account details (requires login)
- Landlord/manager form (requires login)
- Service request
- Residential rates
- Business rates
- Bill payment info (business)
- Payment options (residential)
- Energy savings tips
- Safety tips
- Automatic meter reading
- Accounts FAQ

The infrastructure management division gives you the following content:

- Suppliers
- Subsidiaries
- Assets inventory

The investors affairs office gives you the following:

- History of the firm
- Dividend history
- Earnings estimate
- E-mail alerts
